

How an ADHD/LD Kid Graduated from Yale and Cambridge and Became a Marine Officer

Growing up, I was always the "different" kid. I had trouble paying attention, I was easily distracted, and I struggled with learning disabilities. In school, I was often the last one to finish my work, and I often had to ask for help from my teachers. I was also very shy and introverted, and I had a hard time making friends.

Despite all of my challenges, I always had a dream of attending Yale University. I knew it would be a difficult journey, but I was determined to prove to myself and to the world that I could succeed despite my ADHD and learning disabilities.

I started studying hard in high school, and I eventually graduated valedictorian of my class. I was accepted to Yale, and I was thrilled to finally be able to pursue my dream. Yale was even more challenging than I had imagined, but I was determined to succeed. I studied long hours, and I sought out help from my professors and classmates. I also joined a support group for students with ADHD and learning disabilities.

With the help of my support group, I was able to develop strategies for coping with my ADHD and learning disabilities. I learned how to manage my time better, how to stay focused, and how to overcome my procrastination. I also learned how to advocate for myself and to ask for the help that I needed.

After graduating from Yale, I decided to pursue a career in the military. I was drawn to the Marines because of their commitment to excellence and their reputation for being the best of the best. I knew that it would be a challenging career, but I was confident that I could succeed.

Officer Candidate School (OCS) was one of the most difficult experiences of my life. I was constantly pushed to my limits, both physically and mentally. But I never gave up. I drew on the lessons that I had learned in my support group, and I relied on the support of my fellow Marines. I graduated from OCS and was commissioned as a second lieutenant in the United States Marine Corps.

I am now serving as an infantry officer in the Marine Corps. I am responsible for leading a platoon of Marines, and I am proud to serve my country.

My journey from being a young kid with ADHD and learning disabilities to a Marine officer has been a long and challenging one. But I am grateful for the challenges that I have faced, because they have made me the person that I am today. I am proud of my accomplishments, and I am committed to continuing to serve my country and to making a difference in the world.

Tips for Students with ADHD and Learning Disabilities

- Don't be afraid to ask for help.
- Join a support group.
- Develop strategies for coping with your ADHD and learning disabilities.
- Stay organized and manage your time wisely.
- Don't be afraid to fail.
- Believe in yourself.

I hope that my story will inspire other students with ADHD and learning disabilities to pursue their dreams. Don't let your challenges define you. With hard work, determination, and support, you can achieve anything you set your mind to.
