Much of the violence in Peru's gold mining industry is everyday violence. This type of violence is often overlooked by official statistics and media coverage, but it is a significant problem for local communities. Everyday violence can include threats, intimidation, harassment, and physical violence. It can also take the form of environmental degradation, such as water and air pollution.

Everyday violence in Peru's gold mining industry is often perpetrated by security forces, mining companies, and criminal gangs. Security forces are often deployed to gold-rich areas to protect mining operations, but they have also been accused of human rights abuses, including arbitrary arrests, torture, and extrajudicial killings. Mining companies have also been accused of violence against local communities, including forced evictions and environmental degradation. Criminal gangs are often involved in the gold trade, and they have been known to use violence to control territory and protect their interests.

Everyday violence has a significant impact on local communities in Peru. It can lead to displacement, poverty, and ill health. It can also damage the environment and destroy traditional ways of life. In some cases, everyday violence can escalate into more serious forms of violence, such as armed conflict.

The Peruvian government has taken some steps to address the problem of violence in the gold mining industry. In 2012, the government launched a national plan to combat illegal gold mining. The plan includes measures to increase security, crack down on money laundering, and promote sustainable mining practices. However, the plan has been criticized for being too focused on law enforcement and not doing enough to address the underlying causes of violence.

The international community can also play a role in addressing the problem of violence in Peru's gold mining industry. International organizations can provide financial and technical assistance to the Peruvian government, and they can also help to raise awareness of the issue. Consumers can also make a difference by choosing to buy gold that has been mined in a responsible way.

The problem of violence in Peru's gold mining industry is a complex one, with no easy solutions. However, by working together, the Peruvian government, the international community, and consumers can take steps to reduce violence and promote sustainable mining practices.
