The commission's final report, issued in July 2004, was a comprehensive and detailed account of the attacks and their aftermath. However, the report failed to address many of the questions that the families of the victims had about the attacks.

In the years since the report's release, the families have continued to press for answers to their questions. They have met with government officials, testified before Congress, and filed lawsuits. But many of their questions remain unanswered.

Here are some of the questions that the 9/11 families asked and the 11 Commission ignored:

* **Why were there no fighter jets in the air to intercept the hijacked planes? ** * **Why was the North American Aerospace Defense Command (NORAD) not able to track the hijacked planes? ** * **Why did the Federal Aviation Administration (FAA) not ground all flights after the first plane was hijacked? ** * **Why did the World Trade Center towers collapse so quickly? ** * **Why did the Pentagon not have any surface-to-air missiles to defend itself? ** * **Why did the government not take any action to prevent the attacks, even though there were warnings that they were coming? **

These are just a few of the many questions that the 9/11 families have about the attacks. The 11 Commission failed to address these questions, and the government has refused to provide answers.

The families of the victims deserve answers to their questions. They deserve to know what happened to their loved ones and why the government failed to protect them. The government has a responsibility to provide answers to these questions.

Until the government provides answers to these questions, the families of the victims will continue to suffer. They will continue to live with the pain and grief of losing their loved ones. They will continue to wonder what happened to their loved ones and why the government failed to protect them.

The government has a responsibility to provide answers to these questions. It is time for the government to fulfill its responsibility.
